teeth came flereely together and his hands were cienched. His thoughts had gone like a flush to Lanera. Was it possible that harm was stended to her? He put the idea away from him almost as soon us conceived. The thing was unimaginable. Craig was here, must be here, in the close vicinity of the house. He could have had no time to communicate with confederates in London. Lenora, at any rate, was safe. Then he glanced around the room and thought for a moment of his own danger. In the dead of the night, as he had slept, mysterious feet had etolen across his room, mysterious hands had placed those few words of balf mocking warning in that simple hiding place! It would have been just as easy, he reflected, with a grim little smile, for those hands to have stretched their death dealing fingers over the bed where he had lain asleep. He looked once more out over the park. Homehow, its sunny peace seemed to have become disturbed. The strange sense of foreboding which he, in common with the others, had carried about with him last night had returned. The atmosphere of the pleasant The atmosphere of the pleasant breakfast room to which in due course he descended was cheerful enough. Lady Ashleigh had aiready taken her place at the had of the table before a glittering array of silver tea and coffee equipage. The professor, with a plate in his hand, was making an approving survey of the contents of the dishes ranged upon the sideboard.

"An English breakfast, my dear Quest," he remarked, after they had "An English breakfast, my dear Quest," he remarked, after they had exchanged the usual greetings, "will, I am sure, appeal to you. I am not, I confeas, given to the plensures of the table, but if anything could move me to enthusiasm in dietary matters, the eight of your sideboard, my dear would do so. I comne fight of your sideboard, my dear sister-in-law, would do so. I commend the bacon and eggs to you, Quest, or if you prefer sausages, those long, thin ones are homemade and delicious. Does Mrs. Bland still cure our hains. Julia?"

"Her daughter does," Lady Ashalash replied amiling. "We are also "Coffee, if you please," Quest decided, returning from his visit to the adeboard. "Is Lord Ashleigh a late sideboard. "Is Lord Ashleigh a late riser?"

"Not by any means," his wife declared. "He very often gets up and rides in the park before breakfast, i don't know where he is this morning. He didn't even come in to see me. I think we must send up."
She touched an electric bell under her foot and a moment or two later the butler appeared.
"Go up and see how long your master will be." Lady Ashleigh directed.
"Very good, Your Ladyship."
The man was backing through the doorway in his usual dignified manner when he was suddenly pushed doorway in his usual dignified man-ner when he was suddenly pushed on one side. The valet who had waited upon Quest, and who was Lord Ashleigh's own servant, rushed into the room. His face was white. He had forgotten all decorum. He almost shouted to Lady Ashleigh: "Your Ladyship—the master! Some-thing has happened! He won't move!

He—he"
They all rose to their feet. Quest groaned to himself. The black box!
"What do you mean?" Lady Ashieigh faltered. "What do you mean, Williams?"
The man shook his head. He seemed almost incapable of speech.

"Something has happened to the They all trooped out of the room he held out his hand. His face, too, "Julia, don't come," he begged.

"I must know!" she almost shricked.
"George 1."
"George 2."
"George 3."
"George 3. was blanched.
"Julia, don't come," he begged.

There was a moment's awful silence, broken by a piercing scream from Lady Ashleigh. She sank down
